It's unfair that Nadia Eweida's right to wear a cross won't be protected, given concessions made to others on matters of belief. The decision in the case of Nadia Eweida, who has lost her appeal today, does not sit well with the general principle that protection from discrimination should be interpreted broadly. Regrettably this judgment might have the effect of providing nationalist figures with further ammunition to preach their own culturally and racially divisive beliefs that the law gives precedence to religions other than Christianity in our multicultural society. For Eweida, a policy which on the one hand made exceptions for her Sikh, Muslim and Jewish colleagues to express their faith through the turban, hijab and skullcap would understandably seem unfair.
